Daily cases numbers are frequently running at double the previous peaks from earlier in the pandemic - and are still rising, with more than 310,000 cases a day.

But UK deaths and case numbers have remained relatively constant since July, and experts believe the AstraZeneca jab may be playing a key part in that.

Professor Bryan Williams, the emeritus director of the Melbourne-based Hudson Institute, also told Daily Mail Australia that there were more vaccines currently in testing which could potentially deal with any new strains such as Omicron.

While daily cases numbers are still worryingly high in the UK, running around 40,000 a day, deaths have become relatively rare at just 10 per cent of the country's worst figures.

The UK and Australia were the two main nations to have a widespread rollout of the locally produced and Oxford University-created AstraZeneca vaccine.

Most other countries relied on mRNA jabs like the US-produced Pfizer, while China and Russia produced their own.

Pfizer and other mRNA jabs package the vaccine in a droplet of fat, while the AstraZeneca delivers its vaccine via the shell of another harmless virus, the adenovirus.

Now researchers are exploring whether the use of AstraZeneca may have played an important role in the UK's resistance to the latest wave.

More than 4,000 are dying every day across Europe at the moment with Russia, Germany, Romania, Poland, Austria and the Netherlands among the worst hit (pictured, a man walks past a closed tourist information office in Austria during the fresh lockdown)

There has been violence on the streets of Europe over Covid clampdowns as the virus gains ground once more (pictured: protesters set up fire in the street during a demonstration against Belgium government's measures to curb the spread of Covid-19)

AstraZeneca is suspected to cause a longer T-cell response than other vaccines - a vital part of the immunity process - which could make it more effective in a long-term battle against Covid.

'That seems to be important in any vaccine over other vaccines,' Professor Williams said.

'But it's really difficult to tell because huge numbers in the UK population [around 10 million] have had Covid, even before vaccination.

'We're looking at a very large amount of immunity within the population because of natural exposure, plus the effect of vaccination with AstraZeneca.'

CURRENT COVID-19 VACCINES

Three main types of vaccines have so far been used in the fight against Covid-19 around the world, but more are in trials and under development.

ADENOVIRUS VECTOR VACCINES

This type includes AstraZeneca, and uses a modified adenovirus to deliver DNA coded with a SARS-CoV-2 protein to spark the body's immune system into action. A similar mechanism is also used in the Russian Sputnik V and Chinese Convidecia vaccines which have been rolled out in China, Russia, Mexico, Brazil, Argentina, Chile, Ecuador, Moldova, Belarus, Hungary, Serbia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Indonesia, Malaysia and the United Arab Emirates. The US-made Johnson & Johnson jab is also the same type but was initially only a single-dose vaccine, until US authorities recommended a second booster shot in October 2021.

mRNA VACCINES

The two other vaccines currently approved in Australia - Pfizer and Moderna - both use this platform to deliver Covid-19 immunity. Both contain RNA or messenger RNA in a drop of fat which then causes some cells to develop a harmless version of the SARS-CoV-2 spike protein to kickstart the body's resistance to the disease. Side effects are very rare but the vaccine needs to be stored at a very low temperature, which causes distribution challenges, especially in third world countries. A freeze-dried version is currently under development which would not need to be kept cold. It has been approved and used throughout the world except for a handful of countries including Russia and China.

INACTIVATED VIRUS VACCINES

These are more traditional forms of vaccines which take laboratory-cultivated Covid-19 virus particles and kill them with heat or formaldehyde but still retain the proteins needed to create an immune response when injected. It is the same type of technology that was used in the 19th and 20th century against cholera, plague, typhoid and rabies. It's the mechanism behind the Chinese CoronaVac/Sinovac, BIBP and WIBP vaccines, India's Covaxin, Russia's Covivac, Kazakhstani QazVac, and Iran's COVIran Barekat.

SUBUNIT VACCINES

Often known as protein vaccines, this a controversial new technology which just uses a small piece of protein to create the immune response. Critics claim the proteins may be too small to be recognised by the human immune system. The vaccines are largely still in testing, but Russia has authorised its EpiVacCorona for use, along with Turkmenistan. China, Uzbekistan, Indonesia and Malaysia are also using a Chinese version, ZF2001. The US-produced Covovax has been undergoing trials in Australia, Mexico and India and has been authorised in Indonesia and the Philippines.

INTRANASAL VACCINES

These nasal spray vaccines are the holy grail against Covid - easy to distribute and easy to use, with no needle fear. So far there are no nasal spray vaccines for Covid-19, but there is one for the flu - brand-name FluMist in the US and FluEnz in Europe - which may see a Covid version developed eventually.

FUTURE VACCINES

New technologies that are being developed that could be used in the fight against Covid include virus-like particles, which mimic the virus without including any virus material, DNA vaccines which uses genetically modified cells to re-write the body's blueprint to fight the disease, lentivirus vaccines which inject new genes into the body to make it immune, conjugate vaccines which is a two-pronged varied of protein vaccines, and using a harmless variant of the rabies virus vesicular stomatitis - currently used as a 'trojan horse virus' to help fight AIDS - which also carries the Covid-19 spike protein.

The professor warned Australia now faced a surge in Covid case numbers as restrictions are relaxed, borders open and families gather over Christmas.

But he was confident the mass vaccination rollout had reached a stage where the impact on health will be minimal - for now.

'Increasing travel is going to result in potentially increasing numbers of infections even among the vaccinated population,' the professor said.

'We've got a very different situation here. The number of people here that have been affected by Covid naturally is very low, relative to the population.'

Professor Williams is confident the mass vaccination rollout had reached a stage where the impact on health will be minimal - for now (pictured, masked shoppers in Sydney's Pitt Street)

Professor Williams said a booster program will be absolutely vital to maintain protection among the population before the country heads into winter (pictured, shoppers view Christmas displays at Sydney's David Jones department store)

'But we have a very highly vaccinated population. That doesn't mean to say we won't have breakthrough infections, but their viral loads are much lower than anyone who's unvaccinated and they seldom end up in intensive care or dying from Covid.'

He said a booster program will be absolutely vital to maintain protection among the population before the country heads into winter.

'I am concerned that we will get through the summer okay with a very high vaccination rate,' he said.

'But come winter, people will have a waning immunity to the virus.'

'It is going to be important to have a third dose of the vaccine - it doesn't really matter which vaccine you get - but it will be important to get the third dose, the booster dose. That is certainly important.'

He added: 'I think it is best under the current political environment that these third doses should be highly encouraged rather than mandated.'

'My impression, from talking with colleagues who were vaccinated early this year, is that they are all getting their shots as soon as they are eligible.'

'I suspect this will be the same for the general double-vaccinated population. But active encouragement and ease of vaccination will be required.'

Low vaccination rates in highly populated third world countries mean new strains may develop which could spread worldwide again (pictured, empty tourist spots in Austria)

Globally, low vaccination rates in highly populated third world countries mean new strains may develop which could spread worldwide again, just as Delta did when it broke out from India earlier this year.

At the moment the Omicron variant is causing most concern. Experts say it has more than 30 mutations – the most ever recorded in a variant and twice as many as Delta – that suggest it could be more jab-resistant and transmissible than any version before it.

'There are other vaccines coming which will give different levels of protection from the Delta strain of Covid and any other strains that happen to come along,' Professor Williams said.

'It's important the vaccines keep pace with that, and they will, because the new ones will be different from the current mRNA and AstraZeneca jabs.

Professor Williams says politics may prevent booster shots from being made mandatory, but he believes everyone who has already been double-jabbed will want their third dose (pictured, racegoers at Randwick Racecourse after Covid restrictions had been lifted)

'These will be introduced and approved by the Therapeutic Goods Administration over the next several months.'

'So far though, there is no evidence that there is any strain more infectious than the Delta strain - but that doesn't mean it couldn't happen.'

Evolution suggests Covid will eventually develop into a more infectious but far less lethal disease, until it become something like the common cold.

'That's been found with other viruses, and certainly that's in the virus's interest in terms of evolution,' Professor Williams said.

'Common respiratory illnesses are caused by different strains of coronavirus - and they just give you a cold basically.'
